It's a sad sign of the times that this has probably happened to you: Either you, or someone you know, has lost his job. If you're lucky enough to still be working, you may experience some survivor guilt.

“And there’s almost nothing the promise of a soda pop won’t cure.”

Fair enough, but it is in all ways preferable to not actually having a job. Remember this.

But, as a practical matter, how do you discuss anything work-related with an out-of-work friend? It's just not cool. Let's say your buddy wants to go out for a drink. First of all, you're picking up the tab, that much is clear from the start. But what if you are snowed under at work and can't get out in time? What do you say? Do you call and complain and say that you're behind on three projects and haven't started on four more, that you can't believe how hard they're working you and sometime you just get fed up and want to...

Uh, no. Instead, you do this: You say nothing about it. You go out for the drink, you listen, you get back to work. And you're thankful that you get to, your pal none the wiser.

And so it is with Mark and Ed. What to say? Anythin's better than nothing, but a little thought first works wonders. And there's almost nothing the promise of a soda pop won't cure.
